- Dry fly rigs are used to present dry flies on the surface of the water.

- Nymph rigs are used to present nymphs below the surface of the water.
- Streamer rigs are used to present streamers behind a lure or baitfish.

Dry Fly Rigs

A dry fly rig is composed of a leader, tippet, and dry fly. The leader is a length of line that connects the tippet to the fly line. The tippet is a length of line that connects the leader to the fly. The fly is the artificial insect that you are using to attract fish.

The length and weight of the leader and tippet will depend on the size of the fly you are using and the depth of the water you are fishing. A longer leader will help to keep the fly away from the line, which can make it more difficult for the fish to see. A heavier tippet will help to keep the fly from sinking too deep in the water.

When constructing a dry fly rig, it is important to use a knot that will not weaken the line. The most commonly used knot for this purpose is the clinch knot.

Nymph Rigs

A nymph rig is composed of a leader, tippet, and nymph. The leader is a length of line that connects the tippet to the fly line. The tippet is a length of line that connects the leader to the nymph. The nymph is the artificial insect that you are using to attract fish.
